

Low Libido and Your Health

Low libido can be attributed to many things in couples who have found themselves at an impasse in their physical relationship. On a physiological level, low libido can be attributed to age-related hormone decline, poor eating and exercise habits, postpartum depression, mental disorders, menopause, andropause (male menopause), medication side-effects, and other health issues. Environmentally, mental stressors created by work and family responsibilities, financial issues, personal conflict, and even living conditions can cause a lack of interest.

Mental and Physical

Desire is not only hardwired in our brains, but also in our bodies. Both men and women may have experienced the mental desire, but are unable to function physically. Typical symptoms of sexual dysfunction for men is erectile dysfunction, and for women, vaginal dryness. While hormonal declines and imbalances can attribute to the loss of physical responses, blood flow can also be a factor. Low blood flow through the arteries could be a sign of heart disease or other underlying health issues.

Sexual Health and YOU

A healthy sex life can not only retain the intimate attachment to your partner, but it's also good for you! Sex increases the heart rate, floods the body with endorphins and hormones that have healing properties, burns calories and is also good for the brain.

Men vs. Women

Sexual health is unique to each individual, man or woman. What works for one person, may not be the solution for another. There is not a singular fix for low libido issues. A customized approach will always yield the best results.
